Ridden for the First Time: An M/M Erotic Short up, form errors. Given the many possible ways to instantiate a virtual interviewer-a range of possible expressivity, sensing capabilities and responsiveness to respondents' signals, and a range of more and less human-like facial motion and detail-we propose the following design considerations for building virtual interviewers for actual surveys that produce population estimates: Designing to maximize participation: Potential respondents are likely to vary in whether they will consent to interact with a virtual interviewer, for example, in an online survey. Because the same Wizard manipulated the virtual interviewers in this study across all conditions, his detection of and judgments of the meaning of respondents' facial and bodily displays and verbal behavior were likely to be consistent in the different conditions.
